

WHAT HAPPENED TO CMBS ISSUANCE IN 2016?

RESEARCH ARTICLE

February 2017

What Happened to CMBS Issuance in 2016?

The final tally is in, and U.S. CMBS issuance fell by nearly 25.0% last year to $76 billion. This marked the first annual decline in issuance since 2009. A number of factors influenced CMBS issuance declines, such as a volatility of bond spreads in the first quarter, implementation of new regulation, and investors requiring greater compensation for perceived increased market risks. After six consecutive years of growth, many market participants are wondering if last year's performance was an anomaly or if it represents a secular shift in CMBS expectations.

Market participants expected another year of growth for CMBS. Early projections called for the market to reach between $100 billion and $125 billion in 2016. Market participants had reason to be optimistic given the more than $87.1 billion of CMBS loans that were scheduled to mature during the year (according to Trepp), interest rates were expected to remain historically low, and property sales activity appeared likely to remain robust. Normally, these would be solid predictors of increased issuance. Commercial mortgage originations from securitized lenders, however, slowed early in the year as it became challenging to profitably price loans amid rising market volatility.

What caused the uncertainty? Investors became increasingly concerned about a global economic slowdown in early 2016, as U.S. GDP slumped to its slowest first half of the year since 2011. As a result, bond spreads widened as investors demanded more compensation for perceived risk. Contemporaneously, new risk-retention rules were set to take hold in December 2016, requiring issuers to retain at least 5.0% of each transaction. Investors and lenders struggled to price loans appropriately given the strict regulatory environment and the broader market uncertainty, which ultimately resulted in a deterioration in annual CMBS issuance.

Looking ahead into 2017, CMBS volume will likely remain flat (at roughly $70 billion), or decline slightly. Lenders are still grappling with risk-retention rules and while U.S. economic conditions appear to be on solid footing, the unknowns associated with the Trump administration adds another layer of complexity to the market. While it is too soon to determine the long-term viability of the CMBS segment, the sector faces significant headwinds and will likely have a diminished role within the credit markets in near term, especially compared to its peak transaction volume of $230 billion in 2007.

CREDITS & DISCLOSURES

Dr. Will McIntosh
Global Head of Research
Phone: 210-641-8416
Email: Will.Mcintosh@usrealco.com

John Kirk, CAIA, CCIM
Senior Associate, Research
Phone: 210-690-6715
Email: John.Kirk@usrealco.com

Mark Fitzgerald, CFA, CAIA
Director, Research
Phone: 210-690-6706
Email: Mark.Fitzgerald@usrealco.com

These materials represent the opinions and recommendations of the author(s) and are subject to change without notice. USAA Real Estate Company, its affiliates and personnel may provide market commentary or advice that differs from the recommendations contained herein. Certain information has been obtained from sources and third parties. USAA Real Estate Company does not guarantee the accuracy or completeness of these materials or accept liability for loss from their use. USAA Real Estate Company and its affiliates may make investment decisions that are inconsistent with the recommendations or views expressed herein.

The opinions and recommendations herein do not take into account the individual circumstances or objectives of any investor and are not intended as recommendations of particular investments or strategies to particular investors. No determination has been made regarding the suitability of any investments or strategies for particular investors.

Research team staff may make or participate in investment decisions that vary from these recommendations and views and may receive compensation based on the overall performance of the USAA Real Estate Company or its affiliates or certain investment funds or products. USAA Real Estate Company and/or its affiliates or clients may be buying, selling, or holding significant positions in investments referred to in this report.